Excerpt: . . . the engineering profession and the foundation as the training obtained in school and out. It is not the illllilsslllg of information which is most highly desired, but rather the knowledge where to find that information which he needs. Memorizing of formulas is to be discouraged. By thoroughly understanding the natural laws and fundamental theories involved the necessary formulas can be derived at will. An engineer should be unafraid to trust other men with the minor details of his work. It is highly improbable that an engineer be a faultless draftsman surveyor, physicist, chemist, or mathematician. His duty is the acquaintance with the methods of instructing these men most efficiently. Because he is a better furnace care-taker than the man he has hired for that purpose is insufficient cause for discharging the furnace man. With due consideration for John Ruskin's literary ability, together with appreciation...
