Bernard M. Rosenthal, Berkeley, first edition, 1990, 1990. Book Condition: New. Printed wrappers, 8vo, 26 cm, iii, 209 pp From the publisher's prospectus:"Present-day information science is generally regarded as a novelty springing directly from the recent advances in technology, electronics and computer sophistication. It is shown here that 'Bibliography', for centuries the chief means for recording, organizing and disseminating awareness and knowledge of available information, is clearly the forerunner of our present-day information science. Professor Balsamo traces its evolution from its medieval beginnings to ca.1900, and describes its role in the development of scholarship, literature, science, politics and ecclesiastical policy.
